

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

5.1 Conclusion

Based on the results of the analysis of cooperative principle on Asumsi's interviews with Denis Tetyushin dan Lyudmila Vorobyova on Russia-Ukraine war issue, it can be concluded that the interviewees obeyed and also disobeyed the cooperative principle maxims. The interviewees obeyed the maxim of quality, quantity, and relevance. The obedience is done to answer the interview questions briefly and truthfully with the motivation to give validations to the interviewers and answer the questions that can be concluded as a small talk before get into the main discussion topics. In addition to that, both interviewees disobeyed the maxims as well. The disobedience is divided into two, which are flouting and violation.

According to Cutting (2002, p. 40), a speaker can be said to 'violate' a maxim when they know that the hearer will not know the truth and will only understand the surface meaning of the words. While, According to Grundy (2000, p. 76), a maxim flouting happens when a speaker makes the hearer think that he or she is following the cooperative principles. In order to understand the utterance that is produced by the speaker, a hearer should figure the connotative meaning out.

The maxims which were flouted by the interviewees were maxim of quality, quantity, and manner. Moreover, the maxims which were violated by the interviewees were maxim of quality, quantity, relevance, and manner. The disobedience happened due to the intention of the interviewees to simplify the information which was delivered to the interviewers and audience. Besides, the flouting maxims of cooperative principle also done in a form by giving messages that contained implicit meanings to the interviewees. Thus, it can be concluded that the maxim of obedience and disobedience happen not only in informal conversation but also in those formal interactions such as interviews with politicians.

5.2 Suggestion

This study which mainly studied the cooperative principles of obedience and disobedience still has some restrictions. This study analysed interviews from one news outlet. Thus, to obtain more comprehensive study results, a deeper research in many other resources is necessary.

It is suggested that future researchers will study the cooperative principles in different types of utterance or objects such as talkshows or podcasts to be compared with this research in order to collect better understanding about cooperative principle analysis in the future.
