ABSTRACT

This research aims to examine the correlation between family supportive supervisor behavior and work-life balance of female nurses in the emergency room. This study uses a quantitative correlational method. The participants involved in this study consist of 35 female emergency room nurses. Participants were obtained using saturated sampling techniques based on predetermined criteria. This research uses the family supportive supervisor behavior scale ($\alpha = .917$) and work-life balance scale ($\alpha = .838$). The results of this study indicate that there is a significant correlation between family supportive supervisor behavior and work-life balance in female emergency room nurses. This can be inferred from the correlation analysis results with a correlation coefficient (r) value of .552, which falls into the moderate category and shows a positive correlation with a significance value (p) of .001. This indicates that the higher the family supportive supervisor behavior, the higher the work-life balance in female emergency room nurses, and vice versa.
