ABSTRACT

The Self-Help Housing Stimulant Assistance Program (BSPS) is a government program aimed at helping Low-Income Communities (MBR) to obtain decent housing. The implementation of this program emphasizes community involvement and participation in every stage of the program's execution, from planning to utilization. In addition to participating in every phase of the program, the community also engages in various forms of participation to support the implementation process, such as making efforts to fulfill self-help requirements. This study aims to describe community participation in the implementation of the Self-Help Housing Stimulant Assistance Program (BSPS) in Gates Nan XX Village, Lubuk Begalung Subdistrict, Padang City.

This research uses a qualitative descriptive approach. Data collection techniques include in-depth interviews and document studies, with informants selected through purposive sampling. The theory used in this research is Max Weber's Social Action Theory.

The results of this study indicate that in the implementation of the BSPS program, the community as program recipients are involved in three stages: planning, implementation, and utilization. In carrying out the program, the community also engages in several forms of participation aimed at supporting the construction process. These forms of participation include involvement in organizing the Aid Recipient Group (KPB), fulfilling community self-help efforts, participating in construction planning, and participating in the selection of builders or workers for their respective homes. This community participation aims to instill a sense of responsibility in the program's implementation in their village.
